"Millions for hogs, but not one cent for humans" would make a good slogan for those who are opposing the expansion of the School of Medicine to keep pace with the growing needs of the state of Kansas. The state spends liberally for the investigation and cure of diseases to which porcine flesh is heir. The appropriation for hog cholera serum will go through unquestioned. The state rightly figures that money will promote the health of live stock is well invested. It pays. It is surprising that there are people who do not realize that the human inhabitants are, even commercially speaking, worth more more than any other form of life on which a dollars and cents valuation is placed. An appropriation which will promote the health and well being of the people of a state is a good commercial investment for that state, if the discussion must be narrowed down to considerations for commercial advantage.
